The present study thus suggests that the current framework for the investigation of anomalous transport in a double-well potential has some fundamental limitations, the understanding of which needs to be improved. However, we note that the two sets of measurements of the dynamical conductance that we present here are not directly comparable. In our present experimental setup, we have a complete isolation from the environment at all times, which is an important condition for obtaining the dynamical conductance measurements. This means that in our experiment we are measuring the quantum particle's scattering from the potential  $V(t)$  directly, as opposed to the AC-conductance which is measured through the interaction with the environment. Furthermore, we can think of these measurements as corresponding to two different settings: first, in the adiabatic (quasi-static) limit, the system has relaxed to the instantaneous ground state corresponding to  $V(t)$ ; secondly, in the out of equilibrium (non-adiabatic) limit, the system is allowed to equilibrate between its instantaneous ground state and an excited state. In the former case, the dynamics of the electron within the potential is slow and
